It is in this phase of the work that water--atmospheric, terrestrial and oceanic--is considered. Each is considered by itself, then reviewed in its relations to the atmosphere and the lithosphere. (d) Summary. Here the whole field is reviewed and its highest significance--its relation to the earth as the abode of man is sought. GEOLOGY. The course in Geology consists of class-room and field work; laboratory work in mineralogy, lithology, and the study and classification of fossils. The class-room work involves recitations and discussions based upon topics assigned to the class, and the presentation of special topics by students. The general subject is considered under the following heads: First.--Dynamic Geology; treating of the causes of the earth's changes and climatic variations including the forces at work in making rocks, soils, mountains, continents, oceans, basins, etc. Second.--Structural Geology; treating of the kinds, structure, arrangement and composition of rocks. Third.--Geogony, or Cosmic Geology; treating of the origin and formation of the earth as an individual planet. Fourth.--Paleontology, or Historical Geology; treating of the life, physical changes, and successive events in the history of the rocks, continents and oceans. The field work consists of excursions to available points of geological interest under the direction of an instructor; and accompanying this work, the collection and identification of at least twenty-five specimens of the rocks and minerals of the region. In connection with this latter some instruction is given in the arrangement of cabinets....
