Excerpt: .feature of the chromospheric spectra, which the photographs enable us to investigate at different elevations, is the difference in the behaviour of the gaseous and metallic lines. In the spectrum taken very near the moment of second contact, representing that of the lower strata with the spectra of higher ones superposed, the metallic arcs are relatively short and very bright, while in later photographs representing the spectra of successively higher strata free from admixture with lower ones, the metallic arcs are relatively feeble. This is also indicated in another way by the varying effects seen over the tops of lunar mountains and through indentations in the moon s limb. Some of the lines are seen to be relatively much brighter in the upper strata than in the lower, such lines showing no notable increase of brightness at the points where lower strata are revealed through lunar valleys. Chief among these lines are those of hydrogen, helium, and calcium (H and K), but there is an additional line at wave-length 4686 2 or thereabouts, which behaves in the same way. This line does not appear in YOUN(; s list of chromospheric lines, and all attempts to trace it in known spectra have failed. A line apparently coincident with it, however, has been found in the photographed spectrum of a tube containing helium, which is one of the series of comparison spectra taken with the 6-inch prismatic camera to facilitate the reduction of the eclipse photographs....
